

Another Great Site In Spain

The Palacio Real, also known as the Royal Palace of Madrid, is the official residence of the King of Spain. The King and his royal family do not reside there, but the Palace is still used for state occasions. It is one of Madrid's largest tourist sites with almost 3,000 rooms, 240 balconies and over staircases and is owned by the Spanish state. The Palacio is not just another great site in Spain, but a masterpiece of tourism.

Except when it's in use, the palace is partially open to the public. The 10% of the palace that's open for viewing is full of items to make the Royal Palace the number one tourist site such as bejeweled clocks, exquisite rococo decorations and beautiful tapestries and numerous other precious items. The palace has been in construction for around twenty-five years, yet still holds much of the armory of some of the 18th century heroes.

There is a lot of history behind the palace, which was started by Phillip V. Alfonso XIII resided in the palace in 1931, which gives testimony to the palace have once been a place of power for a powerful country. The palace was designed with French classical architecture and is the former site of Alczar, a Moorish fortress that burned down in 1734. In addition to the building, the grounds are a site for conversation with statues of Atahualpa, the Inca prince as well as the Aztec King Montezuma.

End your traveling with a stop at the Royal Palace for their two-hour tour where you can see some of the most beautiful furnishings in the Saln de Gasparini in addition to a large banquet hall, which will hold and serve over 100 guests.

If you're a real history buff, you'll love the Armeria Real (Royal Armory) and the many weapons and armor on display along with many of the torture methods used in medieval times. All this and more is on display in their throne room.

The Royal Library (Biblioteca Real) gives you a lot for your time such as many Stradivarius instruments, a Don Quixote first edition plus much more. To describe all they have to offer there would take away from the suspense you'll feel when arriving. The Royal Pharmacy will show you the many instruments that are used for the royal family. The pharmacy is still in use today, but it is not open during official doings.

You will want to combine viewing their gorgeous gardens from the Manzanares River while watching the changing of the guards.
